“People often get caught up with the importance of implant selection,” said Dr. Adam Kolker, a double board-certified plastic surgeon in New York City. “It’s not nearly as important as where that implant is going to live. Is it going over the muscle or below the muscle? That decision is 100% dictated by the patient’s anatomy and unique goals, not by a particular surgical technique.”

Kolker added that he would encourage patients to find a surgeon experienced with a wide array of techniques and who can explain why one approach is likely to produce a better result than another for their specific anatomy and goals.

“Motiva has produced an excellent implant, and Preservé is a thoughtful addition to our surgical options,” he said. “But the best results still come from understanding anatomy, selecting the right technique for the right patient and performing that operation with extraordinary precision.”
